"Korean War Flare Drops"

Aviation Electronics Technician First Class

George J. Widly, USN

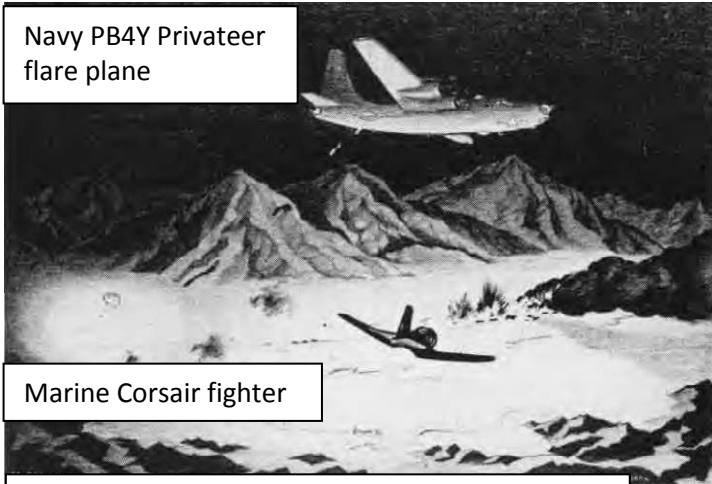

The Korean War (1950 -1953) is often referred to as the "Forgotten War" which implies that the public recognition of the Korean War is considered to be disproportionately low in relation to the "perceived" historical significance. Aviation Tech. George Widly considers it an important part of his life. George served in the US Navy Aviation and flew on a specially designed aircraft, a B-24 redesignated as PB4Y-2, Privateer. The Privateer was externally similar to the Liberator, but the fuselage was lengthened to accommodate a flight engineer's station and new electronics and had a tall single vertical stabilizer rather than the B-24's twin tail configuration. The defensive armament was also increased to 12 .50-in M2 Browning machine guns in six turrets (two dorsal, two waist turrets, nose and tail), with the B-24's belly turret being omitted.

Privateers were used during the Korean War to fly "Firefly" night illumination missions dropping parachute flares to detect North Korean and Chinese troops and vehicles. Once the enemy was detected, flares dropped, the Marine Corsair fighters from the nearest aircraft carrier were vectored in and “disabled” them by bombing and strafing. On one mission, George was arming the flares and passing it to another crew to be launched. As he pulled a flare from the rack, he heard a pop. Realizing the flare was armed from a previous flight and ready to explode, he rushed to the drop tube, knocking the other crewmen aside and launching the flare. The white-hot flare burst as it cleared the tail and lit up the plane from the outside but all were safe. For more information, refer to Navy Patrol Squadron Three.

George Grupe gave some information on the Medal of Honor and the recipients. The Medal of Honor is the highest award for valor in action against an enemy force which can be bestowed upon an individual serving in the Armed Services of the United States. The Medal of Honor is not won or earned; the Medal of Honor is awarded or received. In 1987 there were 322 recipients. In 2000, only 154 recipients remain. Checking the web today October 10th only 81 are alive. At the Santa Ana City Hall there are individual monuments displaying the seven recipients of Orange County that have been awarded this medal.
